Customer Reviews

In book 2 of what I hope will be a long-running series, DI Hannah Robbins and her team are trying to recover from the death of one of their own, all weighted down by varying levels of guilt for that death and each dealing with the guilt not very successfully. The "nothing" case the team is handed to take care of suddenly mushrooms into one of the biggest cases the town has ever seen and the team is tested, personally and professionally. This was a riveting read for me. I found myself thinking about the story when I wasn't reading it, and when I was reading it, the time just flew by. The author brilliantly conveys the miasma of guilt and sorrow the team swims in for the death of a mate, and at the same time, their desperation to stop a crazy random killer who inflicts gruesome deaths by product tampering. What products are being tampered with? No one knows. What's the common thread between the dead? The police are having a difficult time figuring that out. Fear mounts, tempers flare, and the killer becomes even more angry because people aren't getting his message. Describing an interview with the father of a dead girl, Hannah thinks, "But, who was I to judge marriage and the breakdown of one? I hadn't been there. I hadn't felt the poison seep in as the cement holding it all together crumbled around their feet. I could only judge a man with an uncomfortable attitude in a police station and that's what we had here." In addition to struggling to keep her team together, and keep her supervisory position on that team, Hannah struggles with a relationship she's having with a crime reporter, Ethan.
