Government borrowing and monetary creation reach their limits and funds are no longer available for entitlement programs. The thin veneer of civility quickly gives way, revealing the brutal underbelly of humanity. Widespread civil unrest erupts across the country making cities unlivable, and forcing Matt and Karen to bug out to a more rural location. Customer Reviews

Book review As a self proclaimed Prepper, I really enjoyed the format of the storyline. It takes a young financial planner who's tired of his profession and has a side business restoring furniture in southern Florida to eastern Kentucky with his wife and cat. They consider themselves city people who are becoming small farmers in response to the economic crisis. He has cousins in Kentucky who mentor him and his wife. As the crisis develops, crime is rampant in the larger communities people develop programs to protect their homes and families. Many characters die in this scenario and the survivors eventually flee to more rural micro-communities. Militia groups in several states have key roles throughout storyline. If you think on it, you'll easily recognize several current prominent politicians and key government leaders. The events depicted are actual current events and prognostications of the same events stretched out over the course of a little over a year. I was happy to see the characters struggle to get through the day to day problems. Although some of the best characters die along the way, it only adds a touch realism. Stray bullets take out lots of good people every day. Mark Goodwin lays out the globalist's plan to destroy and dominate the North American continent clearly. (They tried in Europe 80 years ago with nearly the exact same programs. The mistake they made that time was letting the US remain out of the conflict while Europe was crippling itself through wars. They won't make that mistake again. The plan this time is to destroy the US first and then bring the rest of the free world under submission).
