Customer Reviews

In this story of Miss Seeton and her friends and neighbors, we see a different perspective of the village of Plummergen. There is not a great deal of village involvement but a great deal of getting to know individuals in law enforcement.Miss Seeton is in London, doing a little shopping and looking at art galleries. When she sees a man who apparently has been attacked and has a great amount of blood on his back, she rushes to his aid. Unfortunately, it seems the man is not wounded, the red is not blood but catsup on his clothing and he has just been robbed.This is part of a pattern of crimes by a gang. And Miss Seeton is taken into the police station, because it is evident she is a part of the gang.After things are straightened out and Miss Seeton is not jailed, the story moves back to the village. Life is relatively uneventful except for the visitors who are old acquaintances of Miss Seeton. They ask a tiny favor and life moves on from there.This part of the book is interesting, but for me it seemed rather slow. There is a family who run out on a hotel bill. We meet an aging hippie who wears robes and seldom bathes. A pigeon is battered by a rain storm. Not one thing seems to be connected to another thing, but as always it all comes together in the end.This book is in the same vein as the original series by Heron Carvic. Miss Seeton is a wonderfully absent minded woman who communicates her thoughts in a rather convoluted manner. She is an artist who at times draws pictures that look at the soul of the person being drawn. She does these drawings in an almost automatic manner. Her drawings, need to be interpreted by intelligent policemen.
